Eddy Battersby, Technical Director at the Government Actuary's Department, retires

After a career at GAD spanning 32 years, Eddy Battersby retired at the end of March. Eddy joined GAD from University in 1978, being appointed Technical Director in 2009, having previously led one of the teams at GAD providing advice to large occupational pension schemes both public and private sector and in the UK and overseas – including Mauritius and the Falkland Isles.

Eddy strongly supports the not for profit, public sector, ethos at GAD as well as “the strong collectiveness and team spirit across the Department, attracting as it does friendly but motivated staff who are dedicated to servicing its unique mix of clients.”

Trevor Llanwarne, the Government Actuary, thanked Eddy for his service and added that “Eddy has been a loyal servant of GAD over many years, making an invaluable contributing to the growth and success of the Department. We all wish him a happy, and no doubt active, retirement.”

Editor's note

1 The Government Actuary's Department (GAD) provides actuarial analysis for the public sector from the public sector, and has been working within government for almost a century. GAD offers actuarial services to governments and public sector organisations, in the UK and around the world, covering pensions, social security and insurance. Based in London and Edinburgh, GAD employs 140 people, of whom 60 are qualified actuaries.
